

[REDACTED]

[REDACTED]

[REDACTED]

[REDACTED]

[REDACTED]

I don't know what goes through the minds of government regulators -- what makes you think that you have some right to know how people spend their own money?

Electronic spending is convenient -- hence, people including myself like using things like wire transfers and debit cards, much easier than cash, but the downside is that you lose the anonymity of cash.

Bitcoin and other technologies hold the promise to provide the best of both options -- convenience and anonymity.

A few years back I read an opinion piece jointly authored by the CEO of Mastercard International and some senior US Treasury official. They were carrying on about how great it was going to be in the future when we get rid of cash and the government is able to see every transaction.

My transactions are not the governments to see. They are not your business. They are not your concern. They are mine. They are private. And I want it kept that way. Stop trying to make problems and mind your own business.

Regards

Gregory

